

Nature

You'll be excited to learn about First Nations Nature.

It's hard to believe, but First Nations hunted Caribou, Rabbits, Antelope, Coyotes, Fish, Elk, Moose, Geese, Buffalo and even Grizzly Bears. Can you imagine standing face to face with a blood thirsty Grizzly Bear?

It's incredible that these colourful hunters followed Buffalo herds. I can't believe how hard it would be to follow stampeding Buffalo herds for food and clothing.

There are many reasons in which stone piles called cairns helped these wise hard workers hunt buffalo. The cairns help push the buffalo off the cliff by leading them to the edge.

Did you know that these creative bison users use every part of the Buffalo? They even used the tongue for a comb and the ribs for sleds. Wouldn't it be weird using a Buffalo tongue for a comb?

Hopefully, you have learned about First Nations Nature.

By Maya W.

In each first nation people shared with the land they lived. They could not keep many things.

They carried their canoes to look for land and a home. They checked everywhere not even a single bit they tried to find a rest ground but no luck they kept looking and looking and looking.

But still no luck their going to find the rest ground and land one more time and he said let's walk together ok so they moved on just then they were on a big hill they saw the rest ground the sign said all the food is for free all you can eat for free but they need something slid on the canoe.

By Marko S.

You would believe that the landscape is pretty important to the first nations.

You'd better believe that first nations sometimes live in the open forest close to the mountains because there are food in the forest. This is important because if the first nations can't find food in the prairies they move to the open forest and in the forest there is food.

First nations eat deer, rabbit, elk, bison, antelope, some times fish and even grizzly bears. This is incredibly important because if they do not hunt food they would starve and some of the trading would stop also they would need bison to make teepees so they need food.

First nations live in very open places because if there was trees in the way they wouldn't see any animal so they don't know where to hunt because all the trees would be in the way to see the animal.

By Mason

Certainly First Nations nature is very incredibly important to the First Nations group.

Did you know that the life of the bison hunters is not simple? Most of the time the First Nations hunt the Bison. The Bison is very big it's like almost the size of a horse!

It's incredible that First nations hunt bison, rabbits and also the huge and risky Grizzly bear!

It's incredible that First Nations people think the Bison is a gift to the First nations Group. The First Nations is very special to Alberta, this is because the First Nations
By Shandel